
Community Update #1

What I've Been Hearing From Neighbors

What I Heard

What's Already Great

Neighbors lend each other eggs, share spare keys, check in at the elevator.

There's a real sense of goodwill in this building. Neighbors lend each other small things, check in with each other, and are quick to respond in the group chat.

It shows up in small, everyday moments and it's something special.

 This community already has something special.

What I Heard

What's Still Hard

Those who already know many neighbors feel well-supported , and that's great.

For many residents, reaching out beyond those small interactions can feel less comfortable. Borrowing something simple is easy but the kind of support that requires trust and familiarity is harder when people haven't had a chance to connect.

We already have a platform, but it's focused on building maintenance, not community.

💡 If we could see what's already available - tools, skills, who's open to what- reaching out would feel much easier.

What I Heard

Trust & Community

There's also interest in having more natural, low-key ways to get to know each other- whether through casual interactions or shared moments- so that building those connections feels more organic.

💡 You can't lean on someone you've never spoken to.

What I Realized

Through these conversations, one thing became clear:

- Our community already has the goodwill.
- What's missing is a way to discover each other, connect naturally, and support one another - while fully respecting each other's space and boundaries.

I've started thinking about ways something like that could look for our building

What I'm Working On

I've started putting something together - a tool for our building where you can

- Get to know your neighbors,
- See what's available - tools, skills, help
- Share what you have, and connect

All on your terms.

No personal information will be shared without your consent. I'm not asking anything of anyone.

Everything in this update is anonymized - who said what stays between us. No personal information will be shared without your consent.

More to share soon.
